A CHAMPION IS MADE

It's been one hell of a year for Stephen Curry. In 2015, the sharp-shooting point guard made his second All-Star Game, was named the Most Valuable Player in basketball, and led his team to a championship, their first title in four decades. "Professionally, this is the best year of my life, for sure," the superstar tells us on set—but only after sufficient prodding.

The truth is, Curry is not one to boast. The all-world talent would rather talk about teamwork than individual accolades, and he definitely does not view his accomplishments in a vacuum. Even when confetti rained down this past June, as Curry stood on the podium, atop the basketball world, waiting his turn to touch the trophy, he saw this storybook season as part of a larger personal narrative, one largely defined by hard work and perseverance.

"My early years in the league were a struggle," Curry recalls. "We had coaching changes, roster changes, and that's when the ankle injury started to creep in." And yes, the kid was nervous, too. "I always had nerves going into games. I think it's natural to have those nerves," he says now. "It shows that you care, that you want to be successful. Once you start playing, those nerves go away."

And for Curry, as soon as those nerves melt away, confidence takes over. "I feel creative when I'm out on the floor," he explains of his jaw-dropping playmaking ability, which has left opponents flat on their backs—creating instant viral classics—while literally giving other opponents nightmares.

There is a seemingly improvised quality to Curry's unpredictable moves, but you would be wrong to think he ever feels out of control. "It may look crazy," he warns. "It may look like an impossible play. But I had confidence that I could do it, and that's why I tried it, and usually, it works."

Both on and off the court, confidence is key to Curry. "I don't try to be anybody other than who I am, and be the best version of myself," the 27-year-old says. "From how you dress to how you walk to how you talk to people, it's all about having confidence in yourself and just enjoying life."

And yet, the reigning MVP wouldn't be enjoying any of this half as much if he didn't have loved ones by his side, from family members in the stands to his young daughter on his knee after each game. "All of this is nothing without your family to be able to share it with," he says.

Family has also influenced how Curry spends his time away from the court. "As a parent, I know my only goal in life is to protect my children," he says, relating why he is so dedicated to causes such as the eradication of malaria. "For those families, they can't protect their kids from a mosquito bite," he adds. "I find things that I'm passionate about, and I'm able to use basketball and my career as a platform to raise money and awareness for these causes."
