THE NEW YORK TIMES MAGAZINE

Salt of Salt-N-Pepa, earrings (circa 1990)

As one of the few female acts in rap's early years, Salt-N-Pepa rocked bling with the best of them: dookie chains, nugget rings, even gold teeth for a brief spell. But earrings like these gold bamboo-textured hoops were the rare feminine-coded accessories in a bizarre culture where even the most macho M.C.s wear necklaces and bracelets without apparent contradiction. "Women were trying to keep up with the men back then," says Cheryl James, better known as Salt. "Because it was their territory."

THE NEW YORK TIMES MAGAZINE

Tyler, the Creator,
"Igor" pendant (2019)

While some rappers use jewelry to invoke their idols, be they divine or cartoonish, others look no further than their own metafictional avatars. (Rick Ross famously owns a chain depicting Rick Ross wearing a Rick Ross chain.) Tyler has always filled his albums with shadowy alter egos; for his 2019 album, "Igor," he commissioned this elaborate likeness in gold and diamonds from the Los Angeles jeweler Ben Baller. "I got it to see the visual aspect of the album in 3-D," Tyler says. "The screens and paper feel flat after a while."

Roddy Ricch, dinner plate pendant (2022)

To anticipate the obvious question: Yes, the fork and knife come off. Roddy Ricch has eaten fruit with them. They have caused problems at the airport on more than one occasion. "Hella times I buy jewelry and it just sits on my neck," says Roddy, who had this piece made by Elliot Eliantte to celebrate his latest mixtape, "Feed Tha Streets III." Practical as it may be, it's not everyday jewelry: He puts it on "when I want to feel a certain energy, get back to a certain place. I'm in the studio wearing it right now."
