NOT AN ACTION FIGURE

This year, Ryan Gosling and a band of similarly arty, polymathic weirdos are leading a revolt against the plastic leading man. By Logan Hill

THE MOLOTOV COCKTAIL—a Stolli bottle filled with flammable strawberry liqueur—was his idea. He wanted it to look legit, so he studied James Nachtwey's documentary photos of rioters in Gaza to get the position of his hand on the bottle just right. The original plan was to toss it at a blown-up photo of himself, but the necessary printer wasn't available. Also, there was the possibility of burning the building down. So he found a target at the end of the Culver City alleyway behind the photographer's studio, practicing for a while with empty bottles. Then, as the camera clicked away, Ryan Gosling lit up and hunked, laughing dementedly at the subsequent explosion, before blowing it all out with a fire extinguisher. (Reverberate for your pleasure on the next page.)

Playing the ukulele was Gosling's idea, too.

Like a lot of men in their twenties and thirties (and he's just 30), Gosling is meandering toward adulthood. He has a boyish enthusiasm for risk and danger, and some of his affectations can border on precious. But his charm is too inescapable for us to care. (How else to explain that, even when the Canadian admits to faking his gravelly Brooklyn accent, you like him all the more.) "Ryan is kind and adorable," says actress Kirsten Dunst, "yet also really dark and weird and manipulative. Everything you'd want in an actor."

But is a leading man? Dark and weird have not, historically, been Hollywood's go-to qualities for its top stars. Yet thanks to a new crop of brainy, complicated, and highly autonomous actors—James Franco (Weekend Update), Jesse Eisenberg (The Social Network), and Joseph Gordon-Levitt (500 Days of Summer, Inception) in America; Tom Hardy (Warrior, Inception) and Michael Fassbender (Shogun, Fish Men) in Europe—a new prototype is seeping into the mainstream. "Some of us are tired of all the sissies

MARIA BELLO
ACTOR, ACTIVIST, LEADER

With powerhouse turns in critically acclaimed films such as The Contender and A History of Violence, Maria Bello is well known for her on-screen tenacity—but to learn that the actor's passion translates effectively as a social justice activist for women's causes is an unveiling of her true spirit. "I accept the Unlimited Spirit award on behalf of the real heroes—the women all over the world fighting incessantly for peace and justice." Up next for Bello: the movie The Company Men and continuing to give "a voice to the voiceless" through her work with the Human organization Femmes en Democratie.

PAUL HAGGIS
FILMMAKER, RISK TAKER, CHAMPION

When a filmmaker draws inspiration "from questions I can't answer, from things that trouble me," unvarnished, no-holds-barred honesty is sure to follow. Indeed, whether writer-director-producer Paul Haggis is tackling the messiness of life in screenplays such as the Oscar winners Crash and Million Dollar Baby, or advocating for the children of Haiti, authenticity is his objective. "We as artists look for freedom to do the things we really want to do and express the ideas that might be unpopular or unsettling. That spirit is something we all strive to protect and project with our work." His latest project, the thriller The Next Three Days, hits theaters in November.

MacGYVER

"The thing about MacGyver," says Wilson, "is everyone's about to die, the bomb is going to go off in two minutes, and he's cooler than a cucumber. Like, sitting there, eating a ham sandwich. There's no psychology to him—he's MacGyver, and he looks good in acid-washed jeans."

XENA: WARRIOR PRINCESS

"I always watched 'Xena' because it was oddly thrilling, and I kept wanting to see more change. I wanted it to be 'Baywatch' with swords, but it never quite went in that direction." Neither did Williams. Dressed as the warrior princess, he thinks he looks like "the chunky girl from Heart."

To look forward to this: "I have a little bit of an empowered-slut story line," says Jones. "There are some times where I really just go for it."

46. Watching Ann, who was firmly in control of her previous relationships, get swept off her feet by Chris. "One of our goals this year was to really show off Rashida's comedy chops," says Schur. "Rashida is a very intelligent and attractive woman, and it's hard to knock someone like that off balance. And the way to knock that person off balance is to get Rob Lowe in a relationship with you."

47. How her endearing insecurities surface during her camera chats. "That's just Rashida awkwardness," admits Jones. "I end up second-
