ANGELA SARAFYAN

If ever there were an actress who harkens back to an earlier era, it's Angela Sarafyan. The 30-year-old Armenian-born, California-raised brunette moves with grace and quiet deliberation. When she speaks, she appears at once completely present and entirely lost in another, more poetic reality. It's no wonder she was cast to play the coveted part of Tia, an insightful vampire with gravitas to spare, in the mega-blockbuster The Twilight Saga: Breaking Dawn—Part 2. The role was her breakout moment and in the year since its release she has shot a head-spinning seven films, among them director James Gray's 2013 Palme d'Or-nominated The Immigrant, in which she plays the sister to Marion Cotillard's Ewa Cybulski. Of Cotillard, Sarafyan says, "I admire her very much and she's an inspiration to me." She also cites actresses such as Italy's Eleanora Duse and France's Jeanne Moreau among her favourites.

But, lest you think it's all seriousness and highbrow with her, Sarafyan readily admits to loving everyday things—such as mascara. Maybelline New York Great Lash is the only one for her, she says. "Over the years, I've tried so many and that's my favourite. It's so good because it gets your lashes one by one," she explains, waving a phantom wand in front of her large, expressive eyes. Kind of like how she's defining her career—one impressive performance at a time.
