++ STEVE CARELL arrives on his bicycle, a cruiser with a leather seat and big white cushy tires, and immediately starts doing Steve Carell things—things so normal, things that suggest a person so well-adjusted, that they almost seem to be a put-on. He locks the bike to a post. He walks into a diner in Toluca Lake. He gets a cup of coffee. The waitress does not immediately recognize him, but when she does, it's as a son: "You cut your hair!" He spreads—I swear this is all true—The Toluca Times, official community newspaper of the San Fernando Valley since 1937, in front of him and proceeds to read with great interest about the local doings here in the Valley, pausing from time to time to sip coffee and look cheerful. He is ten minutes early.

He has come off this way since the beginning, as a regular guy beset by irregular circumstances. Even in his roles this has been true. Think of his amiable, hapless Daily Show correspondent; Michael Scott, heart and soul and dying smile of The Office; Andy Stitzer, the 40-Year-Old Virgin, a man so adrift on his own thin lie ("I've borked a lot of women in my day!") that you want to come rescue him and hug him and remove him

MEN OF THE YEAR

The Breakouts

Eddie

Redmayne

Age: 32
Hometown: London
When we first saw him: 2012's Les Misérables, serenading Amanda Seyfried with drama-club favorites.
When we knew he was good: His transformation from dashing to disabled as physicist Stephen Hawking in this fall's The Theory of Everything.
Best strategy for landing and/or blowing a role: He met Theory director James Marsh at a London pub, and "it was at about 3 p.m.—that killer moment where you're not sure if the other person will be drinking. I went bulldozing in for a pint, and he had a coffee, and I was like, 'Oh no.' I ended up having three or four more, so as it wore on, he got more wired and I got more pissed."
What's next: The villain in 2015's Jupiter Ascending, from The Matrix directors Andy and Lana Wachowski.
