GILT COMPLEX

IN A GRAND TURN-OF-THE-CENTURY DUPLEX, MAN-ABOUT-TOWN KENNETH JAY LANE LIVES A GRAND TURN-OF-THE-CENTURY LIFE
WRITTEN AND PHOTOGRAPHED BY SUSAN MORSE
PHOTOGRAPHY BY PIETER ESTERSON

THE HUGE DRAWING ROOM in Kenneth Jay Lane's apartment is one of New York's greatest hidden treasures. Lane's reaction when he first saw it—"Finally, a square room!" he proclaimed. "And what a ceiling!"—was probably not much different from that of Lord Pembroke, who had commissioned Inigo Jones to build the sensational cube room at Wilton House some 350 years earlier.

The great room in Lane's duplex was, in fact, built by America's leading turn-of-the-century architect, Stanford White. The architect's fans can be divided into two groups: those who revel in the nostalgic drama of his fatal love affair with the underdog starlet Evelyn Nesbit, and those who revel in the extravagance of his Belle Époque architecture. What survives of White's work are mostly public buildings. His private houses were, for the most part, too expensive to maintain.

Lane's Provençal digs, the core of a landmark townhouse on Manhattan's Park Avenue, are a brilliant exception, and virtually all the original details remain intact. You enter into a complex, beautifully appointed foyer, where the soaring walls are painted in subtly varying shades of red. Circular mirrors reflect light above a pair of faux-painted burled-walnut doors. A staircase rises to a balcony and the bedroom, with a ceiling of the palest forget-me-not blue. Beneath the balcony, a third door opens to reveal the splendor of the drawing room.

Even the most elaborately reconstructed rooms from the Edwardian era often seem to have the life drained out of them. Not Lane's apartment. It is not a reconstruction, nor is it furnished
