ECUADOR

In Fino Veritas

Blame it on a U.S. president that a straw hat made on the coast of Ecuador is known, erroneously, as a Panama hat. A photo from the turn of the 20th century showing Teddy Roosevelt (wearing said hat) near the Panama Canal construction site helped to create the misnomer. The headwear actually originated in the coastal town of Montecristi, Ecuador, where some of the finest hats are still produced today.

Made of tightly woven strawlike toquilla palm fibers, Panama hats, called sombreros de paja toquilla in Ecuador, are light in weight and characterized by a black band and wide brim. Today, their quality ranges from cheap knockoffs made in China to high-priced Montecristi finos, the handwoven, hand-blocked version from Montecristi.

"These high-end hats are works of art, not articles of clothing," says Tom Miller, author of The Panama Hat Trail. "What's special about them is the craftsmanship, the raw material that they start out with, and the care that goes into weaving and finishing the hats—it's a whole process."

For travelers interested in purchasing a hat in Ecuador, Miller recommends visiting one of the several high-end stores in Montecristi. In general, the tighter the weave, the higher the quality. The weave of finos is so tight—up to 50 strands per square inch—that the hats take on the texture of fine linen.

If a $5,000 price tag puts a Montecristi fino out of your reach, Panama hats made with only 20 strands per square inch can cost $500 and are still considered quite good, just not quite so fino as fino.

—Aaron Britt

The Panama hats shown here are available at jthatcenter.com. Prices range from $400 to $1,200.

IRELAND

Shear Warmth

The traditional sweaters featured here are $99 and up, and include a mix of cable and honeycomb stitches. In Ireland, buy them at Murphy of Ireland, Main Street, Ballybofey, County Donegal, 353/(0) 74-9131-029-045. In the U.S., visit murphyofireland.com

Residents of Ireland's Aran Islands, a trio of islets at the mouth of Galway Bay, know a thing or two about braving the elements. For centuries, the farmers and fishermen who live there have dealt with buffeting winds and driving rains that surge across the Atlantic. Their principal means of defense? A "fisherman's," or Aran, sweater.

Producing the thick woolen sweater is a time-intensive craft, since authentic Arans are knit entirely by hand. "A proper Aran might have 100,000 stitches," says Mary Conneely, of Cottage Handcrafts in County Galway, "and if you care for it, it will last a lifetime."

Legend has it that each Aran clan developed its own distinctive stitching for sweaters, with patterns that included ancient Celtic symbols, cables (evocative of seamen's ropes), diamonds (farmland), or zigzags (the island cliffs). These patterns have been passed down through generations and remain powerful symbols of a family's heritage. As a sad aside, the stitches are also believed to have helped identify bodies of fishermen who washed ashore after accidents at sea.

Today, visitors to the islands clamor for genuine Aran knits. As with many traditional crafts, though, machine-made varieties have flooded the market in recent years. Ask for handmade sweaters at local crafts shops, and be ready to pay a little more for the genuine article.
